Historically, a lack of tolerance for physical and cultural differences has caused conflict not only within society, but also within the workplace resulting in a toxic work environment and inefficient workplace. Learning to appreciate the diversity in the physical characteristics of coworkers as well as the diversity of their perceptions, attitudes and interpretations improves the overall work environment as people learn more about what it means "to walk in someone else's shoes." ConnectiCOSH's Cultural Diversity training seeks to increase our awareness of the diversity within ourselves and our coworkers by exploring how cultural differences affect our own perceptions and responses to others.
